Anni, I miss you so bad. Baby, I want to snuggle with you❤️🥰🤗😘

My family has decided not to buy any sweets for Halloween this year. Ever since we moved from San Ramon to Danville, no one has come to our house for trick-or-treating, so we think it is safe to assume no one will come this year anyway.

Philly's entry-level IT job market was not that good this week, but at least it seemed to be a little better than last week.

The overall situation is very depressing to think about. The number of people in Danville alone who know what happened between us is utterly absurd. When they first heard the story about us, they might be like, "Oh, cute." However, if people ask them if they would hire me if I somehow applied to their team's job opening, they will probably say no. This is one of the reasons why I became even more and more depressed since last year, when I was working at Maison Benoit, because I became more and more aware of the scope of the propagation of the gossip. If people can make enough money to afford to live in Danville, that usually means they have established a good career and have access to a lot of resources and connections. I was like, bruh, that's a lot of opportunities I will never be able to have access to. Although the Bay Area is the global center for technology, I have realized that I cannot build a career here despite my interest in cybersecurity. What a way to deepen my depression.

To make matters worse, I don't know how many RITSEC alumni know the story. I know many of them do, and many RIT faculty members do (because, quite frankly, they were pretty bad at hiding the fact that they know, or they did not want to hide it), but I don't know exactly how much damage it will do to my job hunt. What I know is that if I applied to a team that has a RITSEC alumni who knows about the story on, then they would probably recommend against me if they got asked about their opinion. This is because I don't imagine they would want to work with me when you don't even want to talk to me. This is the impression Jack gave me after I read what he said in the report.

I know there are a lot of RITSEC alumni who know; I know there are RIT faculty members who know; I know Lucas Morris from Security Risk Advisors already knew when he was still teaching me (I actually like him as a teacher btw. I just felt the impending doom once I realized he knew, since he was like the fourth teacher that year whom I realized knew the story while actively teaching me. Again, they were pretty bad at hiding the fact that they knew, or they did not want to hide it); I know that my first academic advisor at RIT knew before she got the new role at RIT; I know you have told your current colleagues about the story; and cybersecurity is a very small circle. Girl, my career is like dead, dead.

Let's say if I get an entry-level helpdesk role, it is still very bad since I would probably need to work another 10 years to get back to the level of career progression if you did not do Title IX. This is because the offer I got from the team I interned at was Cybersecurity Software Engineer, and it would probably take 10 years of job hopping to get from helpdesk to this role. I would have to be 34 years old to get back to my career standing of 22 years old if you did not do Title IX.

The only possibility that I can say I managed to break even in terms of career progression is getting an offer for a junior Cyber Security System Engineer or an offer for a junior Cloud Security Engineer. This is because these are the two directions I want to grow in, and if I started as a Cybersecurity Software Engineer on the team I interned with, it would probably take me two years to transition into either of them anyway. However, given the current job market, it is not that likely.

Anni, if you talk to me, then I can live with what I just talked about because you are my everything, and I want to marry you. However, if you don't even talk to me, then the cumulative damage to my career really makes me suicidal. If you don't talk to me by the end of this year and I don't get a job in Philly by then, I will kill myself.

I think that's all for today. I wanted to tell you some funny stories to lighten this diary entry up a little bit, but I am just really sad right now. I am surprised that I even managed to type this much. I guess I will tell you some funny stories in the next diary entry. Anni, I love you❤️🥰🤗😘
